Today, I learned the basic of JAVA for my friend's need. My friend's need is communicating between users, and I assumed the communication will be done in the middleware (like PHP's). My friend used the RabbitMQ for his application and I am a little confuse how a framework do the job in the middleware. I find the official document don't mention anything about communication framework. So could anyone explain me about that? A: In Java you would create a new thread for each new connection and in RabbitMQ there is a thread available per each connection. As @Andrew said, a framework acts as a middleware that provides you with a set of tools to build your application. For example you could use Spring and its IoC container. There are also frameworks like Spring-Integration, Spring-Rabbit and many others that can help you to write cleaner code and probably spend a few less lines of code in your project. Hope this helps.
